Not illustrated. 1890 Excerpt: ...that result is accomplished he will be very little nearer to any real gain which science could bring to him. It is only labour and perseverance, added to natural capacity, that can give a scientific mind. This is so, and the present system of grant-earning education in science and art falls a long way short of bond fide scientific study. We doubt almost whether the teaching of this kind is even sufficiently thorough to give students that sympathetic insight into studies alien from our own which Lord Derby talks about. We remember, not so many years ago, a batch of science students at a local school of science and art sitting for one of the examinations. Out of the lot there were perhaps two who might really be called students; the others amused themselves at it--came when they liked and did as they liked when they did come. But the whole, with one exception, passed first class and took a Queens prize. The mystery (for it was a mystery for the time being) was solved when it was discovered that the correct answering of a certain question of a particularly practical nature was the real cause of these students success. The reason of their being able to pass this crucial test was thus wise:--The evening before the examination had been devoted by the teacher to a careful experimental examination of the problem involved in the question, the results of which were greedily absorbed by the students who, like drowning men, clutched at the chance straw thus held out to them. And the card turned up trumps! But of course there is science-teaching and scienceteaching, and that in the Liverpool School of Science, the Yorkshire College at Leeds, and the Victoria University at Manchester is of a far different quality to that referred to above. And in case...
