Not illustrated. 1910 Excerpt: ... loss of memory, inability to concentrate the mind, infantile convulsions and other phenomena. Surgeons have learned from experience that when a patient has a sudden rise of temperature which cannot be accounted for by infection, the best thing to do is to administer a cathartic, or high enema, and thoroughly empty the bowel, a procedure which, if followed by a prompt reduction of the temperature, proves that local absorption was the cause of the trouble. Headaches of various degrees of intensity are a consequence of constipation, among women, sick headaches, which may occur periodically, and are not relieved until free catharsis is resorted to. Neuralgia is a frequent result of constipation. Loomis called it a cry of the nerves for better blood. it may occur in any part of the body. A constant auto-intoxication leads to imperfect nutrition of the cellular elements of the body. The first to suffer are those of the lowest order, the fibro-elastic tissues, which enter into the composition of the various fasciae and suspensory ligaments of the viscera. As these cellular elements weaken under the influence of auto-intoxication they no longer possess sufficient power to sustain the various viscera and ptoses occur--gastroptosis, enteroptosis, coloptosis, all of which aggravate the condition by increasing the sympathetic shock or depression of the system, by decreasing the physiological efficiency of the various organs, by diminishing the peristaltic action of the colon, allowing it to assume a V-like or hammocklike or festooned position wherein fecal matter accumulates, leading to further intoxication. Thus we see that the initial habits of constipation which may result at first from removable causes, lead to a genuine vicious circle--that is, intoxic...
