

The Wonderful Trout (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Wonderful Trout
In all scientific endeavour and elaboration, those who strain after perfection, and put off that hour when they hope to get beyond criticism, only stand in their own light and in the light of real discovery. By the time they decide (i.e. if they ever do) to publish the results of many years experience, it may be then they only do so and find there is nothing new under the sun. Such delay is more likely to end in disappointment and chagrin than if they published prematurely. It is the embryo of a new idea which adds to future knowledge, because it sets many a-thinking years before the thought-wave would be otherwise started. If Darwin had more elaborated before publishing, Wallace might have outstripped him. About the Publisher
