

As Executive Director of Bread for the World, Arthur Simon knows firsthand how much social good organizations such as his can do. In this book Simon points out the inseparability of Christian faith and social concern, and he urges Christians to become involved in public policy issues. Simon acknowledges that public policy issues are often complex and can spawn misguided efforts to help. But, he argues, the biggest mistake of all is to take no risk for others and do nothing. The separation of church and state, says Simon, is a necessary political principle. But the separation of religion and life is a contradiction of biblical witness, since both the Old and New Testaments call believers to show God's love and justice in the world. Using hunger as a primary example, Simon shows how Christians can significantly improve the lot of the needy. Intended for general readers, this clearly written book will be of special interest to socially concerned Christians. Study questions enhance the book's value as a resource for individuals or groups.
